My work begins with the act of knowing that the places that shaped me no longer exist as I remember them; change, development, and time make any return partial and altered. Rather than documenting landscapes as they are, I rebuild geographies that live in my memory through collage, digital manipulation, installation, often using tan printmaking paper whose newsprint tone reflects the fragility of recall. In this work pieces are suspended or connected with rope, emphasizing impermanence and support. The work is actively moving through the desert of Arizona, the humidity of the South, Hawai'i's ocean and saturation, and New England's shifting seasons. These locations have formed a scattered sense of home built from fragments rather than fixed coordinates. I use color and black-and-white photographs as different points of reference within memory: black and white marks long-term, deeply ingrained impressions - textures and moments that feel embedded but distant - while color reflects an ongoing search for feeling, atmosphere, and emotional immediacy. Time bends and distances compress as the landscapes become self-portraits, holding the ghost of place and the traces it leaves behind in one's memory.
