

Daniel Rajcsanyi

CV

Daniel Rajcsanyi (1992*) fuses sculpture, fashion, intimacy and the body to create performances, photographs, and music. All these different mediums lead to the cosy world of production that is where his audience is taken. Daniel's practice usually comprises the body, either his or of friends and welding these to explore what this means when reconstructing the scene as well as analyzing what bodies mean in different environments, by his own journey of these portrayals Daniel examines the functions that different characters look from a social perspective. „Mocking life as a one-hit-wonder and nothing has any matter. The selfie breaks the rules of self-expression. A mock on the self-expression of these days. I want to defeat. Defeat the vision of the self and break this ideology of beauty. Passing out is my goal of high. An orgasm with every usage.“

Sweetheart

A monumental, soft-pink “cock cage” emerges from the gallery wall, encasing a magnified image of Victor the dog’s erect penis. The sculpture pairs this surreal architecture with Victor’s calm physical presence, his real body echoing the image behind him. The contrast between the oversized fetish object and the animal’s composed, obedient pose challenges our boundaries between animal instinct and human sexual repression. Victor becomes both subject and mirror — his visible arousal confronts societal taboos around animal sexuality, dominance, submission, and the fetishization of control. While the cage suggests chastity and shame, Victor remains unbothered, free, and present — dismantling the divide between nature and culture with quiet defiance.

Old horse with young heart, and hopelessness + stdsouvenir

In this intimate photographic series, the artist stages himself in a state of complete dissolution — physically, psychologically, and nationally. Wearing a Bavarian blindfold — a symbol of homeland, conservative morality, and cultural identity — he surrenders to anonymous, older male bodies. The blindfold renders him blind to origin and reality, while the camera exposes every trace of shame and boundary.

The series explores themes of voluntary submission, sexual self-erasure, drug-induced trance, and the collapse of identity. The “insemination” by the older, married man becomes a metaphor for the penetration of traditional values by queer bodies — for the intrusion of desire into the scaffolding of family and societal order.

The artist becomes a vessel, a projection surface — emptied, possessed, permeable — navigating a visual language that shifts between raw corporeality and symbolic readability.

Faces of Jupiter

with Nora Aaron Scherer

Faces of Jupiter is a cinematic-performative video work that translates the ancient myth of Jupiter's rape of Io into a contemporary visual language. The focus is not on the act itself, but on the complexity of divine power, projection and sexual violence in cultural memory. Jupiter appears as a multifaceted, dazzling figure - at once seducer, tyrant and mirror of patriarchal fantasies of desire.

Io, the object of mythological desire, is not portrayed as a passive victim, but as a fragmented consciousness oscillating between ecstasy, alienation and resignation. The work refers to the historical romanticization of assault in mythology and art history - from Zeus to Picasso - and raises the question: How deeply is violence embedded in the cultural imagery of desire?

By deliberately interrupting aestheticized moments of desire with documentary fragments, textual quotations and disturbing overlays, the piece develops an ambivalent visual language that does not glorify but exposes: the desire for domination as the core mechanism of the patriarchal spectacle.

Ti Amo

In Ti Amo, Daniel Rajcsanyi explores the realms of the interplay between instinct and intellect across different species.

In the photograph, the artist slides down a pole dance pole, extending his right hand toward a horse’s head. The two beings touch, creating a peaceful, creative tension between them. One might interpret that the horse, in a sense, recreates, grounds the artist, and frees him from his lustfulness. The artist’s pose is highly erotic; he wears a red leather thong and slides down the sexualized object of the pole dance pole.

In 1508, Michelangelo depicted The Creation of Adam. In this portrayal, God the Father is positioned on the right side, and Adam on the left. God the Father is depicted emerging from a human brain, symbolizing reason, intellect, order, and calm. These qualities are transferred to Adam as their fingertips touch, conveying the wisdom of God the Father to Adam.

Applied analogously to Ti Amo, the horse shows the artist the path to wisdom and order, dispelling the lust and instinct that dominate the artist’s left side. At this point, a confrontation with one’s existence and perception begins.

Does the animal not stand for wildness? The term “animalistic” originates from the animal kingdom, inherently tying instinct to it. Yet the horse in Ti Amo exudes elegance and sophistication. Its tail is groomed and smooth, its coat brushed and immaculate. If it were human, it might be described as “neatly bourgeois.” In contrast, the artist’s hair appears disheveled and untamed, lacking order, suggesting a sense of driven excess. This internal struggle, the human battle with instinct, is often represented in mythology through centaurs—beings with the lower body of a horse and the upper body of a human. Sebastiano Ricci’s Centauromachia from 1715 depicts this conflict as a warlike and violent confrontation, symbolizing the struggle between instinct and intellect.

Here, however, the artist reverses the paradigms. The horse’s head represents wisdom, while the human’s naked body is open and communicative, almost inviting. This creates an atmosphere of calm and order, entirely devoid of conflict or violence. The artist elevates himself from instinctual urges to the intellectual strength of the horse, becoming, in the process, a kind of animal himself.

In the depiction of centaurs, the mastery of sexual urges was always idealized. Sexual desire was consistently seen as a force to be combated with martial means, as in the Battle of the Centaurs from 1492. In Ti Amo, this paradigm shift continues: sexuality is not understood as an external abstraction to be controlled but is instead seen as something peaceful and capable of fostering harmony in coexistence.

Ti Amo was created on a city farm. In this environment, the horses are usually ridden with blinders to prevent them from perceiving their surroundings and deviating from their path. However, in this case, the horse has an unobstructed view, while the artist wears a robot-like visor. The blinders, symbolically, are placed on the human. This reassigns the spheres and raises the recurring question: Are instinct and intellect not one and the same, merely different sides of the same coin?

Distant Memories

Exhibition Text

Using photographic, sculptural and performative means, Daniel Rajcsanyi creates allegories and fields of tension of personal mythologies. The private world (as exposed and marked body) is in immediate touch with signifiers of widespread cultural and historical perspectives on the human being. Entanglements of intimate and social realities lead to an energetic impact that bears potential to sharpen the comprehension of these dimensions in our unconsciousness. They pursue an overcoming and reversal of resentments and ruptures of the taboo.

Transformations of the body into medium and canvas, can be seen as ways of emancipation of the self. Naked body as mirror of its needs. In his works, painting and tattoo mark Rajcsanyi's body and refer to traces that are - sometimes irreversibly - left in the identity. In his alter ego „Florian Böhm“, innermost needs, the urge to satisfy them and therein the detachment of discipline, devotion and sacrifice in the sense of a better self transcend.

As central work the installation „Hdl/Der Anfang der Liebe“ depicts the artist in rear-view presenting a flower. In doing so, he casts inviting glances into the camera, while his head is colored in bright orange. The simultaneous depiction of romantic gift and sexual receptivity unite apparent contradictions. While the practice of giving flowers has long tradition and has always been lived out publicly, the expression of sexual desire is marked by repression and masquerade.

The Overcoming of traditional views on love, identity and sexuality is further pursued in the following works. In vigorous figures, such as the somersault in front of a flaming and five-pointed star bearing the jagged inscription COLLAPSE, symbolic images of reversal and collapse of fixed values are created.

The compositions represent a personal and direct confrontation of the own world, constituted by experience and perception, and its environment. Elements like thorny roses or button-stitched upholstery reflect the broad emotional dimension of transformation between pain and intimacy, between aggression and sensitivity. In their plasticity and composition of linked symbols, they resemble totems. Framed in a palette of orange and red, associations with images of fire, blood and the devil, but also of youth, love and joy emerge.

Daniel Rajcsanyi uncovers cornerstones of the unconscious that shape our access to reality. At the same time he reverses their meanings, breaks them open and expands the structures of our perception.

The Couch

exhibited at Solo Exhibition Format STRK

The Brown Couch is a performative installation addressing the stagnation of societal values and the toxic forces of radicalization. At its center is a couch — an everyday symbol of comfort, stability, and familial values — completely painted with a self-made brown pigment derived from filtered feces.

The choice of material is deliberately provocative and unsettling. The faint smell of excrement permeates the space, compelling viewers to confront the work both physically and emotionally. The brown color, historically and culturally associated with “earth” and “roots,” here becomes a symbol of stagnation, pollution, and the remnants of a system unwilling to evolve.

The couch is positioned in the exhibition as an altar — once a place of comfort and togetherness, now coated in a layer of decay and inertia. The installation questions the extent to which society clings to outdated values, even as they lose their function and begin to rot.

The performance can be supplemented with additional elements: documentary audio recordings of radicalized voices from politics and society play in the background, while the smell fills the room. This intensifies the sensation of being trapped in a “living room” of the past — a society stuck in a cycle of nostalgia, unable to move forward.

The work forces viewers to reflect on the concepts of purity, renewal, and collective responsibility. It exposes the longing for “traditional values” as an illusion and reveals how dangerous stagnation and toxic nostalgia can be in a radicalized world.

Thank you

The ten-minute music video for Jorkes portrays true homosexual intimacy as a tender yet powerful expression of connection and desire. The central setting is a small blue pool filled with glittering blue water – a symbolic space where boundaries dissolve, and bodies shine in their authenticity.

The protagonists, their skin glistening with glitter, move in slow motion: playfully, curiously, and with a sense of choreography that exudes closeness. Their touches are gentle, and their movements delicate, building trust and mutual exploration, guided by the rhythm of the music.

As the video progresses, the interactions deepen. What begins as a gentle game evolves into an unapologetic and authentic depiction of intimacy and homosexual desire. The sexual act is portrayed raw and without protection – a deliberate artistic statement on honesty and vulnerability within queer relationships. It is not pornographic but a celebration of freedom, the body, and trust.

The camera remains respectful and observant, emphasizing skin, glitter, and water in a heightened aesthetic without voyeurism. The color palette of blues, silvers, and skin tones amplifies the dreamlike and intimate atmosphere. The use of slow motion and close-ups highlights the small, subtle moments of connection often overlooked.

The video becomes a poetic manifesto for queer love: breaking stereotypes by presenting homosexual intimacy as tender, playful, and powerful – something to be celebrated and recognized as universally human.

Time To Say Goodbye

(Waf Gallery Vienna)

Daniel Rajcsanyi intertwines sculpture, fashion design, DJ'ing, performance, social media and private life to a vibrant composition of expression. In kunstbuero his new works where recently on display summarized under the title „time to say goodbye“. The show was curated by the vienna based artist Lisa Jäger.

Dyed fabric streched on a frame covered with purple leather. One pink object is hovering in the middle of the room. A fidget spinner tucked onto the cap of a brown glass bottle bulges out of the canvas and is highlighted by flashy LED lights. The bottle, well known in the club scene to contain the notorious drug “ghb“, reminds of a modern cruzifix. On the backside, a heart shaped bag is sewn onto the canvas, which beholds a fresh flower bouquet and opens up the association of the drug attending its own funeral.

The exhibition “time to say goodbye“ is based on the personal experience of Daniel Rajcsayi abusing “ghb“ to an almost lethal extend.

“I get loose, wet and fluid. I can be used. That’s the aim. Trapped in dreams of cum and hedonism. Getting more and more until I reach the point of leaving by flying. It’s an escape from talking and nonsense, fixation on the pure level of feeling, of getting pumped full of life. Mocking life as a one hit wonder and nothing has any matter. The selfie breaks rules of self expression. A mock on the selfexpression of these days. I want to defeat. Defeat the Vision of the self and break this ideology of beauty. Passing out is my goal of high. An orgasm with every usage.“

The second exhibition room presents a similar colour sceme. A purple frame leans diagonal in space against a glossy wooden stick. The handmade frame is covered with fabric and ropes in a laborious manner, a shrine or altar depicting prints and photographs of flowers. Where the wooden branch touches the floor, this tiny brown bottle shows itself. The Installation is placed on an elaborately fabricated rug. The Rug displays a flamboyant heart and the stiching of the contradictory word “Fotze“. The view opens up to a selfie on the wall, which was made on this very carpet using a selfiestick plugged into the ass of the artist. The so called „Fotzenfalle“ appears like an ancient trap, approaching the rug could turn out as dangerous in several ways. The prediction of the first room seems to have turned into reality. Display could turn into lived experience of extatic exhaustion. „time to say goodbye“
